The animals' acute hearing means they can often detect potential predators from more than a kilometre away. However, after capturing two wild dogs from the remote island of St Peter and Paul, a conservation team is taking on the difficult task of training them to live in the open ocean. Led by Save the Elephants, the team will be working with the animals in the open ocean to teach them how to live in the wild, and eventually release them into the waters of South Africa. “It is a very challenging but exciting challenge,” said Save the Elephants’ Kirsty Grewar. “We have just begun but we have achieved some really important milestones in the first few months.” “The wild dogs are not used to being separated from their mother, and being taught to live in the ocean is a huge challenge.” The dogs were introduced to the wild on the island by a group of South African penguin conservationists in 2009. The wild dogs have been living on the island for the past five years, and have been taught to follow the penguins. But they now need to be released back to the ocean. The team will also be trying to expand the population of wild dogs living on the island. “We will provide the dogs with a safe place to live and hope they will breed,” said Grewar. “We will gradually expand their territory until the population will no longer be at risk from the introduced predators, and then we will release them.” “I have 82157476af
